Excerpt from The Rise and Progress of Civilization in the Hairy Nation This is a book, and nothing else. There no advertisements in it. It has not been constructed or modified to please or displease any body. I think the title fairly describes the book: that it is what it professes to be - a picture of civilization, in its rise and in the various stages of the short period of its progress, in Davis county, Iowa, otherwise the Hairy Nation. The plan of reviewing each tople, from the beginning to the present, separately, seemed to me the best, as affording the best hope of holding the interest of the reader to the end. The history of the settlement of the United States may be divided into three periods, as distinct in manner as in time. The first covers the settlement of the Atlantic coast and a fringe west of the Alleghanies. During this period the white race was forcing an entrance into the wilderness, by rude, unaided strength the greater part of the continent lying before, an unknown and dreaded, country. The second period covers the settlement of the country from the Ohio to the Missouri; when the White inhabitants of the United States were secure in their mastery of the continent, and were steadily pushing the Indians and the wolves before them, mile by mile and the railroads and other new and powerful agents of civilization were closely following, and supporting their march. The third period, the one now in progress, covers the settlement of the Open. Country west of the Missouri; where the railroads have gone in front, and where a great proportion of the settlers have gone at one leap from the heart of American civilization, carrying with them most of its aids and comforts and some of even its luxuries.
